Research and Innovation: After the EU Referendum

The UK's outstanding research and innovation base is central to our economic, social and cultural well-being. It gives us a competitive advantage and helps increase productivity, grow high-value jobs, and it is the bedrock of cultural innovation and influence. This is a knowledge economy including service sectors where the potential for productivity-led growth is huge. The result of the EU Referendum presents a challenge to maintaining this excellence in the face of uncertainty is having immediate implications and raises many questions. To ensure we represent the best researchers and innovators in their fields, we stand ready to ensure that Britain and Northern Ireland maintains its world leading position in research and innovation. A public commitment from the Government that the UK wishes to retain and build on the research and innovation required to assuage any loss of confidence in UK research.

People Researcher mobility between the UK and EU Member States is key to our economic and cultural well-being. It should be reinforced, and with no detriment to researchers, staff and students based in the UK, those wishing to study or do research in the UK. Currently 15% of all academic staff in UK universities are from other EU countries. We believe it is vital that UK-based researchers and those from other countries are given assurances that they and their dependents will be able to continue to work here. Similarly, opportunities need to be safeguarded for UK researchers to gain experience in other countries.

Collaboration Research and innovation thrive on clear long-term frameworks, such as those provided by the EU. International collaborations lead to research with greater impact - 60% of the world's top co-authored research papers are with EU partners. Given our geographic proximity to many of the world's leading research centres, the relative strength of the research base of many EU countries, UK research excellence is built on collaboration with colleagues in other EU Member States and we need this to continue to flourish. It is vital that we reassure our EU partners of the UK's commitment to research and innovation collaboration.
